In the early 1850's it seems that the Grammar school, founded by Mr Amory was closed and another school was built, presumably the' building that was demolished in recent times which stood behind the church.
The site was acquired by Charles Harvey, a pottery manufacturer and banker who had latterly been living at Longton Hall, where he had a lease for 21 years. The lease was sub-let and Charles Harvey built Blythe House. The mansion was a large building in Tudor style with a tower. The walls were buttressed and large bay windows protruded. Inside the house the visitor entered a large entrance hall with a corridor leading to a morning room, dining room and drawing room. Two kitchens, a 1arder and a dairy supplied the dining room. A grand staircase to the upper floor led into another large corridor with seven bedrooms, a dressing room, saloon and linen room.

In the courtyard at the rear of the house were the stables, coach house, harness room, potting house, wash house and laundry. A cellar stocked with wines and spirits completed the inventory.
The residence stood in about 16 acres of grounds and gardens and the approximate area in modern aspeet would consist of the land from the Smithfield to the crossroads, Cheadle road to Caverswall Old road and the footpath on the Caverswall side of the present school playing fields..
The boundary wall is still in existence today along Uttoxeter road and Cheadle road and so is the entrance by the wooden bridge over the mill-stream, together with a vestige of the original garden.

Charles Harvey died in 1860 and was buried in St James' Church, Longton. There is a stained east window to his memory in St. Peter's Church, Forsbrook.
After the death of Charles, his son, William Kenwright Harvey inherited his estate and in a few years he had ruined all that his father had built up. The bank failed and William, chased by his creditors, disappeared with the gold from the bank, leaving debts amounting to £40,000.
The house and all the contents were then sold by a 6-days public auction in September, 1866. The creditors eventually received 5/- in the £.
